When we read a story we like it to be interesting on the first page, but we also want to get to know the characters as they go through a series of experiences and we become more interested in what is happening to them. The really exciting times in a story happen later when we know all the details that make the peak of the story really exciting. Try graphing that experience.

Turn the next page on its side and graph the impact the story has on you as a reader.

If you do this for a few stories, try to decide if there is a pattern.

Try doing it for a book you didn't enjoy and see if the pattern changes

This is what it might look like.
